WEATHER OF CONCERN

Weather of Concern

Southern California

A significant storm system will be developing off the California Coast tapping into abundant subtropical moisture. As a result, there is potential for a very wet and long duration storm for Southwest California from Tuesday through Thursday night.

- While there is still some uncertainty in where the axis of heaviest rainfall will impact our forecast area, there is increasing confidence that portions of our forecast area will receive significant rainfall with high rainfall intensities.
- Rainfall rates will likely exceed USGS thresholds, with peak 1 hour intensities expected to range between 0.50-0.75 inches, with a 20 percent chance of rates up to 1.00 inch per hour.
- Many areas could see the most significant rainfall totals of the season, with coastal/valley areas generally expected to range between 1.50-4.00 inches, while south and southwest facing foothills and coastal slopes could see between 3-6 inches.
- There will be the potential for significant flash flooding and debris flows in and around recent burn areas, with the highest probability of higher intensity rainfall sometime between late Tuesday night and early Thursday.
- In addition, there will likely be a threat of widespread urban roadway flooding as well as flooding of small creeks and rockslides.

WEATHER SYNOPSIS BY REGION

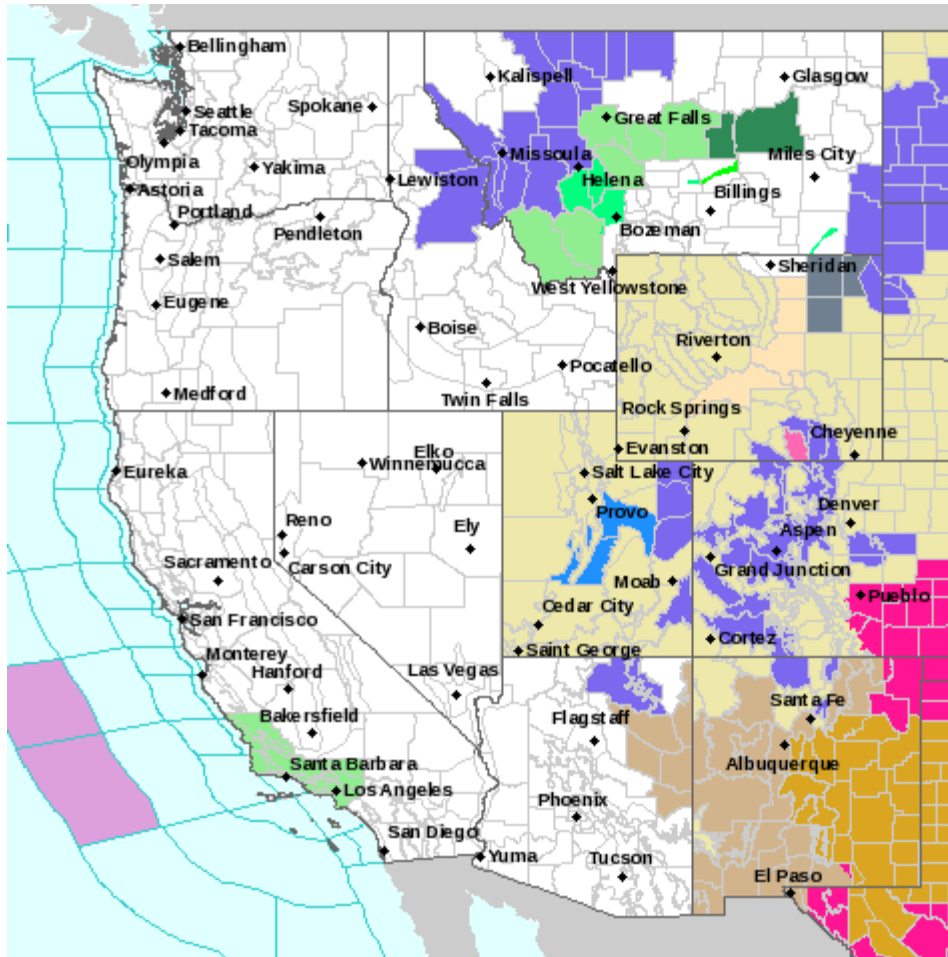

NORTHERN CALIFORNIA

A warming and drying trend will ensue for Sunday through Tuesday. The next storm system is forecast to bring periods of valley rain and heavy Sierra snow along with strong winds Wednesday and Thursday. Conditions will turn cooler late week as a cold front moves through the region and western Nevada.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA

Dry weather with warming will continue into Monday. Increasing cloud cover may bring slight cooling for Orange and southwestern San Bernardino Counties on Tuesday as San Diego County and the desert portions of Riverside County continue to warm. A low pressure system off the West Coast with a subtropical moisture connection is expected to spread rain into central and portions of the region on Tuesday. That chance for rain may extend into portions of Orange and southwestern San Bernardino Counties for late Tuesday and Tuesday night.
